Venus — read this before you dial. The whole game on call one is simple: get them to reply. You're not closing, you're not pitching the catalog. You're a friendly voice from a shop they've already trusted, checking in. A conversation is two-way — until they say something back, it's just a one-way speech, and that's what gets people to hang up.

The mindset (this is the big one)

You came from a call center where calls came to you. Making them flips the nerves — so flip the frame: – These aren't strangers. They bought from us before. Warmest call there is. – Your only goal in the first 10–20 seconds: earn a reply. One "oh yeah, hey" and you've won the opening. Closing comes much later. – You already have the gift. You said it yourself — people can hear your smile, you build the relationship. That's the whole job. Trust it. – Be empathetic — they're busy (or acting busy) and didn't expect your call. So be warm, deliberate, and short. Respect their time and they'll give you some.

Step 1 — CONFIRM who you're talking to (don't skip this!)

Before any pitch: make sure you've got the right person.

"Hi, is this Alejandra?"

Wait for the yes. (This is the fix for the call that hung up — the spiel started before confirming, and a long intro to the wrong/unprepared person = click.)

Step 2 — A SHORT opener that earns a reply

Keep it to 2–3 sentences, max ~15 seconds. Hit: who we are + who we were + the specific thing they ordered + a question. Then stop talking.

"Hey Alejandra — this is Venus with Promo & Grow, you knew us as PrintCo Direct. Looks like about 7 months ago you ordered a banner stand and a tent with us. How's business going?"

Why this works: – "Formerly PrintCo Direct" instantly places us — "oh, that shop." – The specific past order + timeframe (it's right on your call list — use it every time) proves we know them and jogs the memory: "oh yeah, and I think we got business cards too..." That's the door opening. – "How's business?" hands them the mic.

En español:

"Hola, ¿hablo con Alejandra? — Le habla Venus de Promo & Grow, antes PrintCo Direct. Hace como 7 meses pidió un banner y una carpa con nosotros. ¿Cómo va el negocio?"

The opener's only job is to get them talking — honestly, you could almost ask what color the sky is. Any question that invites a reply opens the door. Keep it short, make it about them.

Step 3 — The second they reply, the conversation starts

Now keep it going by asking about them — not by pivoting to what we sell: – "How's business been — anything new or exciting going on?" – "How's growth this year? Busy season coming up?" – "When you ordered that [banner/tent], how'd it work out for you?" – (When it's natural) even ask about family / how they're doing — real warmth, real relationship.

Get genuinely interested. People feel that — it's the whole reason they'll want to keep talking to you.

Step 4 — Find the need before you offer anything

Ask if they need anything right now before you mention products. Be strategic about when to offer — only once the relationship's re-opened and you understand what they actually need. (Remember: someone says "brochure" but means a postcard; "a sign for my truck" might be a magnet or a wrap. Good questions get you to the right thing — that's what builds trust and sells.)

What a good first call looks like (your real scoreboard)

✓ You confirmed the person. ✓ They replied — you got a real two-way exchange going. ✓ You learned one thing about their business. ✓ You set a next step (a proof, a follow-up text, or "I'll check back").

That's a win — log it. Not closing. Conversations started. The closes follow.

You've got the hardest part already — the warmth. The rest is reps. Échale ganas.
